A remarkable number of studies on animal sacrifice in ancient Greek religion has appeared over the last two decades. These studies explore not only the variety of this ritual in cult, but also its significance in society, politics and literature. However, by focusing on just one particular ritual and by emphasizing its centrality, these works give the impression that other rituals that were integral elements of Greek ritual practice are less complex and matter less for the understanding of Greek religion and culture as a whole.

The aim of this conference is to contextualize sacrifice, by giving particular conceptual space to ritual actions that were both closely connected to animal sacrifice and practiced separately, such as, for instance, the burning of incense, purifications and food offerings.

Are the relationships between these rituals dynamic or static? Do certain ritual actions 'bond' more easily than others? How do different interconnections of rituals inform religious communication and religious experience? The conference tries to answer these questions, by taking into consideration inscriptions, archaeological evidence, art and literature. The conference also takes an interest in a comparative perspective and integrates viewpoints from Roman religion and religions of the ancient Near East.
